

Notes

[Motivation]

- This subject is important because you need to get benefit whenever you hire additional staff.
- When you are ready to bring on a new resource, you want to be sure that they are needed and that your company will be able to make full use of them.
- By planning your organization, you will reduce the frustration for both you and the staff.
- So, let's look at "how do you start"

[Detail]

- Organizations are designed
- You want bring on staff based on sound measurements and planning. This way you can avoid hiring only because you "feel" busy
- To do this, you need to plan how your organization will look at various paces of business.
- Understand what roles your company will have, what benefit your company gets from each role, and what performance level your company requires from each role.
- Each role needs to have clear duties and processes to follow
- Write your points down and communicate them both during the interview and again after the hire.
- This will give you a tool that can guide you during the interview process and help you measure how well your new staff is achieving their purpose
- Based on your staff and the expected performance level needed from each role, you may be able to assigned more than one role to a given staff member
- As you bring on new staff, you should examine and adjust staff assignments
- When new assignments are given, communicate them formally to the whole organization

[Conclusion]

- With a little planning and communication, when you bring on a new resource, you can set the right expectations from the start
- You can be sure that the new staff member is really needed and will be busy performing the right tasks.

SC Carbone, Inc.

To get help in understanding your business, talk with SC Carbone. We offer business management and profitability coaching and we will work with you to help your business be better.

Phone: (610) 888-1650 Email: profits@sccarbone.com